International Racquetball Tour Supports Wheelchair Racquetball

It's fast, it's furious, it's hard-hitting full court excitement at its finest. No, it's not the NCAA basketball tournament. It's Wheelchair Racquetball and it's gaining momentum internationally.

One of the latest and one of the most positive developments in the sport is the recent announcement by International Racquetball Tour commissioner Hank Marcus of the cooperation between the men's professional tour and Wheelchair Racquetball. The agreement allows for the support and assistance of the IRT with the international development of Wheelchair Racquetball.

The IRT evolved from the Men's Professional Racquetball Association which was formed in 1989 with Marcus as commissioner. At that time the tour was made up of only four competitive events. An aggressive marketing campaign combined with enhancements to make the professional game more exciting to spectators have resulted in a continuously escalating schedule. The tour currently consists of twenty-two major events and an additional eighteen satellite competitions throughout the United States, Canada, and Mexico.

VW Credit, Inc., the predominant corporate sponsor of the IRT, has provided support that has enabled the tour to strengthen its position in the sports world over the past few years. Currently professional racquetball is available to a broader audience, especially through television coverage on Prime Network and ESPN.

With the overwhelming and enthusiastic endorsement from the players of the IRT, Wheelchair Racquetball can now benefit from the IRT's increased exposure and expanded coverage. "This is something we should have been doing long before now," says Marcus.

The program that the IRT has proposed will see the tour make a donation in the name of the "Player of the Tournament" at each tour event. Marcus adds that "in addition we will assist the Wheelchair group in whatever way possible through our present corporate sponsors."

David Hinton, Chairperson of the Committee for Athletes with Disabilities of the International Racquetball Federation says, "This support will greatly assist in our efforts to bring not just Wheelchair Racquetball but the entire sport to a higher visibility and participation level. With Wheelchair Racquetball as a demonstration sport in the 1996 Atlanta Paralympic Games and the support of the IRT, we feel we now have the opportunities to truly promote our Wheelchair athletes."

Wheelchair Racquetball is affiliated with the International Paralympic Committee (IPC), International Racquetball Federation (IRF), and the International Stoke Mandeville Wheelchair Sports Federation (ISMWSF).

This latest development is another example of two organizations co-operatively striving to do the best that they can for their own athletes as well as for the overall benefit of racquetball in the United States and the world.

There are two ways to play racquetball. Fast and way too fast.
We recommend you play the latter way. Or die trying.
Book 'em, Woody

Woody Clouse, tour veteran currently ranked number ten on the IRT has teamed-up with Appalachian State University’s Dr. Ed Turner to produce the ultimate instructional book for racquetball.

Published by Human Kinetics Publishers, the new book, Skills and Strategies for Winning Racquetball, is scheduled to be released in the fall of this year. The book is designed for use by players at all levels.

Here’s Looking at You, Kid

Do not adjust your set and don’t run out to get your eyes checked. This is for real. Former Atlanta Falcon D. Wayne Hoffman of Bowling Green, Kentucky prepares to let fly one of his patented sumo-samurai serves in a match against Den­ver Parman of Paducah.

Resembling a cross between a martial arts kata and a serial killer’s ritual this unorthodox method of putting the ball into play certainly got the attention of the crowd. Here’s the drill: square-up and face your opponent, bounce the ball, stretch down and place the ball on the line, then turn and fire. Look for it at your next instructional camp.

Racquetball Around Ohio
Wins Penn Award

The Ohio Racquetball association was named winner of the “Newsletter of the Year Contest” sponsored by Penn Racquet Sports. The contest is held to encourage state associations to increase the frequency of their publications and to make overall design and content improvements.

Racquetball Around Ohio, the Ohio Racquetball Association publication was deemed to be “head and shoulders above the rest,” according to Penn’s national promotions manager, Amy Wishingrad. The publications were evaluated on the basis of design, content, and overall appeal to racquetball players.

The publication will receive additional advertising from Penn as a result of winning the award. Doug Ganim is president of the ORA and Steve Lerner is editor of the publication.
Sure ’n Begora

Multi-time champion intercollegiate blaster Tim Sweeney brings a bit o’ th’ banter on the court with him these days with some skin tint in the form of

For the emphasis on junior racquetball. Between soccer, basketball, and baseball, there is simply too much competition for juniors. If a parent wants to volunteer his or her time, let him (or her) go at it. Clubs should offer six month memberships at a nominal fee to college graduates. Once one is off the college campus it’s not easy to find a pickup basketball game or football contest. Once the students start playing racquetball they’ll be hooked.

Be sure there are plenty of leagues and have an active ladder so they can have some regular opponents. Tap the 35+ market. By that age they are fairly established in their careers and might have let their waistlines get the best of them. Have an individual run the leagues. The AARA has the expertise to tell club owners how to run leagues and tournaments. Lots of clubs get greedy and see the big dollar signs. Don’t get greedy. Tournaments encourage players to participate more during the weeks prior to the event. I’ll never forget seeing a fellow entering the 30+ division in his first tournament. He paid his $35 and with his wife and two kids watching, was finished playing in 10 minutes. He faced an open player and after that humiliating experience gave up the sport. If the tournament had been set up so that he could have played several matches, he could still be playing today. I could go on, and on, but those are a few suggestions.

Potpourri

Pro racquetball is taking the cue from tennis. At the start of the third game, new balls are being issued. “At any level of racquetball, especially the pros, the ball is hit so hard, that like tennis, it is important to change balls to get maximum quality and bounce,” says top-ranked Cliff Swain... Will Ruben Gonzalez still be in the top 10 when he turns 50?... Sports Illustrated had yet another racquetball story. The March issue featured the auto accident saga of Jason Mannino. Mannino, if you recall, was a top junior player and some physicians weren’t sure if he would walk without a limp, much less play competitive racquetball. He won the World Junior Games in Jacksonville last December and is quite confident that he’ll become a factor in the pro game... Network Marketing’s Doug Smith received a nice plug. His grip, The Python, could be seen in the Sports Illustrated article... Only two native Floridians have been a factor on the men’s pro tour — Brian Rankin and Scott Reiff. That’s amazing considering Florida is No. 2 behind California in racquetball participation.
Cliff Swain
Three-time Pro Racquetball Champion
Cliff Swain. Three-time pro racquetball champion. Hailed as the sport's all-time greatest player, this 29-year-old Bostonian holds a record that no one has ever touched. A naturally gifted athlete whose serve has been clocked as fast as 192 mph.

Remarkably, the man who dominates professional racquetball began playing by chance. One summer day in 1979, Cliff and his father ran into a friend whose racquetball partner had just canceled. He persuaded Cliff to give the game a try. The thirteen-year-old beat his experienced adult competitor in the very first match of his life.

"I won 13 of 19 International Racquetball Stops in the 1993-94 season which was a record," says Cliff. "It was a good thing, because I can't sleep when I lose. I can't bear to call home and tell my folks and my girlfriend the news. The truth is, I can't enjoy anything until I win again."

Superstar with a great attitude.

We're honored to assist Cliff and his fellow members of the U.S. Racquetball Team by providing them with everything they need for their workouts. From head-to-toe, we outfit the team in HEAD ANATOM® footwear and apparel. They play to win using racquets designed and produced by HEAD.

Cliff says, "I always play wearing the best because I play to win. The best clearly comes from HEAD."

HEAD ANATOM® performance court shoes keep you moving.

Consider the havoc you wreak on your feet during a typical game.

Running... stomping... pounding... leaping... and the relentless impact of landing on your feet and taking off again. At HEAD we consider feet very carefully, which is why we created HEAD ANATOM performance court shoes.

Every HEAD ANATOM shoe cradles your foot naturally, supporting it, and being kind to it. Especially when you're not. The entire line of shoes is designed to reduce foot fatigue while giving you maximum stability and motion control; exactly what you need to play your best.

With our wide selection, you'll be able to choose the performance court shoes that meet your exact needs. Designed and thoroughly tested and re-tested... just like everything we create for athletes.

Built tough for 30 years.

While most of us don't train with Cliff's intensity, it's still vital to have apparel and footwear that won't let you down. You need gear that can stand up to your game, and keep you feeling comfortable, too.

Because HEAD has been outfitting players for 30 years, we know what it takes to create gear for performance.

We’re obsessed with it aren’t we? Always trying to select the finest of the finest, always searching for that superhuman superstar who can dominate life. It can be ballplayers, actors, or models. What is it in our makeup that creates the need to put someone on that pedestal and then compare every other person to that choice? Why are we obsessed with that number one we have chosen to the exclusion of all others?

Muhammad Ali made a career and received a string of sports column inches on his announcements and insistence that he was the greatest. The whole theme that runs through Bernard Malmed’s The Natural is whether Roy Hobbs is the best baseball player that’s ever been (And how you feel about that probably has more to do with whether you read the book or saw the movie than your opinion on the importance of picking the best). I’ve even heard that the devil went down to Georgia to find out who was the best fiddle player ever.

Okay, so maybe I’m a little cynical.

Maybe it’s not as bad as I imagine. Tell me then who was the runner up to Miss America? What team finished third in the NCAA tournament last year? Who is the third highest home run hitter in major league history? What were the four movies nominated for best picture besides the winner at last year’s academy awards? See, I’m only a little deluded and possibly just a tiny bit disturbed.

I’m not trying to suggest that I’m above that way of thinking, either. I’ve been known to play that game where you try to think of the best spinach salad, or the best kiss, or the best stairway you ever climbed. And, I suppose, when it comes right down to it there is no harm in trying to figure out who or what the number one of all time might be.

It might be one of those things that’s so ingrained in our culture we can’t get past it. It might also be something we need. Granted we tend to carry it to the extreme. Take for instance the stock market going up because Michael Jordan is rumored to be quitting baseball to go back to playing basketball. All right, I can’t help it...is Jordan the best or was it Dr. J, or maybe it was Magic Johnson or even Larry Bird...

Anyway, maybe those of us way down at the bottom of life’s glamour heap, those of us who will never be a world class anything need to live vicariously through the accomplishments and perceived assets of others. And, maybe the way to do it best is to have someone at the top to emulate; someone who is so good that he or she tends to transcend all the mundane trials and tribulations that we seem to have to deal with in our daily lives.

In short, I guess we all need heroes. And I suppose it’s only natural to try to determine the best of the best and the greatest of the greatest.

Now, let’s see, about that category of best 40 year old bald editor with an unpronounceable last name...
Because racquetball is an individual sport, players often forget the team concept when it comes to doubles. However, talk to any successful doubles team, and they will talk about synergy. No, they might not actually use the word “synergy” but they are referring to a feeling of positive energy between them when they play their best. Great doubles teams are not necessarily made up of the best singles players, but rather, two people who are able to bring out each other’s strengths and have a great time playing together.

So, how do you go about finding the right partner? We recommend finding someone with whose game you are familiar. Good choices are people that you may have played against several times in leagues or tournaments, and have had intense but fair matches. Choosing someone with whose game you are familiar accomplishes several goals. First, you will know if you enjoy being on the court with him (playing with someone that you like and respect is far better than joining forces with a great player that you detest!). Second, you will have already established some familiarity (while familiarity may often breed contempt, on the doubles court, it is essential to know your partner’s tendencies in timing and shot selection). Third, it will enhance your confidence in the team (a critical ingredient between doubles teams). You have to feel confident in your partner’s ability to do his job on the court. A 10-10 tiebreaker is a poor time to break into the “I” formation because you fear your partner is going to skip the ball.

Okay, so you have found a partner that you know relatively well. The next question is whether or not the two of you can communicate effectively. Is your partner positive and encouraging (“Nice serve. Way to hustle. Keep bringing that Z-serve.”)? Do you even want a partner that constantly showers you with praise, or would it be better to find someone who isn’t afraid to get in your face when you are not carrying your load? In either case, you and your partner should not take offense to constructive criticism or strategy suggestions (“Move your feet. That lob isn’t working, try a jam serve. Hit more wide angles.”). A doubles team should be comfortable enough to pull no punches when giving advice, especially if it is critical to the match. What makes a great team is when each partner know what pushes the other’s buttons in the right way. Experiment and know when to be encouraging and when to be a little more harsh in order to get your partner to play his or her best. Most successful teams have a “quarterback”, the person who calls for shots (“mine”, “yours”) and is more vocal about strategy (“Hit the ball at Wanda’s feet.”). Great teams usually have a quarterback but are able to change roles when necessary.

Now that you have found your partner, try to play with other partners as little as possible. The more exclusive you are with your partner, the more you will begin to think alike on the court. We have been playing doubles together for so long that our movements are completely coordinated on the court. In a sense, we become one player. That’s what makes playing doubles one of the best parts of racquetball.

Eric Muller and John Ellis began playing doubles together at the Junior Olympics when they were fourteen years old. Since then, they have won three age division national titles. In 1991, they became the youngest team ever to win the Men’s Open National Doubles Championships. After repeating their win in 1993, they were the World Doubles Champions in 1994.
Improving Your Doubles Game

1. Hit Wide Angles
The wide angle is the best shot in doubles. It is easy to hit, forces your opponents into back court, and allows you to assume center court position.

2. Concentrate on Coverage
Get everything! The key to doubles is keeping the ball in play. With proper court positioning, you and your partner can return nearly any ball, even those that would be killer shots in singles. The point is to put the pressure on the other team to hit perfect roll-outs to beat you.

3. No Skips
As the court is easier to cover in doubles and hitting a kill shot is extremely difficult against a good team, skip balls are your worst enemy. Don’t put pressure on yourself to hit perfect shots and risk skipping the ball. Rather, assume that your opponents will get everything you hit and force you to go for wide angles and better positioning. Make your opponents work hard to beat you, don’t give them any freebies.

4. Hit Jam Serves and Z-Serves
These are high percentage (easy to hit) serves and cause your opponents to force a shot on a ball that is moving into their bodies, off of the wall. This is awkward, especially in doubles where they do not have as much room to set up. In addition, a jam serve can often cause your opponents to hit a shot “inside-out” (the player on the right side may have to hit a backhand or the player on the left side may have to hit a forehand).

5. Play a Combination Front/Back and Side/Side Coverage
The idea is to cover the court and cover your partner’s backside. If your partner is retrieving a front court pinch on the left side, you should drop back and slide to the right. If you move back to cover a wide angle pass to the left side, your partner needs to move forward to the right. Get the idea?

6. Avoid the Deep Court Splat
Because the court is easy to cover, splatting from deep court usually gives your opponents an easy rekill in front court.

7. Work for Rekills in Front Court
Try to set the point up by hitting hard wide angles, wait for your opponents to shoot the ball from deep court, and then go for the rekill. It is much easier to end the point when your opponents are behind you.

8. Develop the Reverse Pinch
This is a great doubles shot because it can end the rally quickly and catch your opponents out of position. It should only be hit when you are in front court and your opponents are behind you. When hit properly, your opponents will be too far back or on the wrong side of the court to cover the reverse. However, practice this shot before you try it in competition, as it is somewhat of an advanced shot.

9. Communicate With Your Partner
Unlike singles (where you might get called for a technical) doubles should be a vocal game. You and your partner should constantly be communicating both during the point (“Yours! Mine! Cover the pinch!”) and between points (“Nice shot. Keep it out. Let’s get this serve out in one. Did you see that lady with the big, beautiful teeth watching us?”) The more you communicate, the more in sync you will become.

10. Find A Really Good Doubles Partner

The interval between eating and exercise may play an important role in one's performance. Vigorous exercise before a meal will raise your metabolic rate and thereby burn more calories. This elevated metabolic rate may last for as long as 24 hours. Exercise also would deplete the storage form of glucose (sugar), known as glycogen. This means that further glucose which is taken in during the meal can be stored as glycogen and not as fats. Also, the outpouring of adrenaline, growth hormone, and cortisol which exercise causes may reduce hunger.

Vigorous and intense exercise shortly after a meal may cause problems related to shunting of blood away from the digestive tract towards the muscles working during exercise. The subsequent delay in digestion is harmful to the body's processes. This is not to say that a pre-exercise meal is wrong. In fact, fasting for long periods prior to exercise may reduce the glycogen stores to a point that prolonged competition can be impaired as nutrients are running low. One should ideally eat at least two and one-half to three hours prior to exercise to allow time for the stomach to empty into the intestines, and for the digestive process to be well under way.

Excessively large amounts of sugars and carbohydrates should not be taken in during the pre-exercise meal. Approximately one to four grams of carbohydrate per kilogram of body weight should be taken one to four hours prior to prolonged exercise. The closer the meal is to exercise, the lower the carbohydrate intake should be. One gram per kilogram is appropriate while sedentary life-style directly after eating is also inadvisable. Post meal walking aids digestion and burns excess calories.

Carbohydrates loading diets have been popular recently. These diets aim to increase muscle glycogen levels in order to supply energy during prolonged exertion. Exhaustion following prolonged activity may result from a depletion of glycogen (stored sugar). In carbohydrate loading, the idea is to reduce the glycogen in muscles with a low carbohydrate diet for several days and heavy workouts. One then "loads" with carbohydrates and reduces exercise for several days before competition. The body supposedly responds to this method by storing glycogen which can be used as fuel to delay the onset of fatigue during competition. This method is not altogether safe, as it often requires the body to depend upon protein instead of carbohydrates for energy. It may also result in dizziness and weakness during the training phase; and nausea and vomiting during the return to the high carbohydrate diet, known as the loading phase. The best approach is not to be overly enthusiastic on this type of dieting. Eat a balanced diet with the appropriate amounts of carbohydrates, fats, and protein. Vegetables, cereals, pastas and whole wheat bread are good nutritional forms of energy.
This game has been cancelled...
I wanted to let you know exactly why I wasn’t renewing my KILLSHOT subscription. It has absolutely nothing to do with the quality of your magazine. Quite the contrary, I was MORE than pleased with your magazine... It’s well written, informative and of extremely high quality. I am not renewing my subscription because, after nearly 20 years, I’ve lost interest in racquetball. No...what I’m truly tired of is joining leagues and having opponents fail to show up for their matches and not giving anyone the courtesy of a telephone call.

This lack of commitment is a recent phenomenon...and definitely more predominately male. I tried calling my opponents the day of the matches and confirming date and time. I spoke with the league director regarding this problem...concrete, worthwhile suggestions...all to no avail. After over 3 years of switching leagues, appearing for “no show” matches...I quit the club and racquetball.

There is NEVER a reason that somebody can’t pick up a telephone and cancel a game. The clubs and their directors MUST have a firm policy against league members who consistently sign up for leagues and fail to show up or continuously cancel all their games. I wonder how many other people have had the same experiences and given up the game out of pure frustration? For the exercise, I recently joined a local park district league. The attendance is much better but the level of competition is extremely poor. Because it’s not a club, there’s a lack of camaraderie. My heart is not in the game anymore so your magazine is of little interest.

Good luck in the future---you have a great product.

In working with some of the most amazing athletes in the world, I began to realize that every single one of them was subject to the same anxieties, insecurities and other performance-inhibiting factors that I face in every big match. While pro athletes enjoy attributes such as talent, dedication, and resiliency, the successful ones have also mastered the techniques necessary to maximize their strengths. Whether it is the ability to snap out of a slump, to “kick in” something extra to win a tough match, or simply to be able to perform consistently in the face of tension or insecurity, the IRT pros and other professional athletes with whom I have had the privilege to work each keep a personal bag of tricks to reach peak performance.

This started my thinking about all the players that I had faced over the years that could command as much confidence in a crucial match as in a casual game. In fact, I think all of us have seen instances when a player defeats a superior player because the inferior player produces the most from his skills, while the “better” player plays down a couple of levels in a reaction to nerves, distraction, etc. In this light, I became interested in what the best players in the game do to consistently play at their best. After questioning all the top IRT pros (and dozens of other world-class athletes) I came away with an unusual bag of tricks that entailed everything from tried-and-true axioms to ideas drawn from separate perceptions in each player’s own history, to highly specialized and unusual private rituals that stop somewhere just short of sacrificing.

In her instructional publication, Racquetball Today (co-authored with Erwin Goldbloom), six-time women’s professional national champion, Lynn Adams names six muscles or muscle groups on which to concentrate during pre-match by stretching slowly and holding stretched for 20 - 30 seconds:

- hamstrings (back of the thigh)
- quadriceps (front of thigh)
- calf muscles and Achilles tendons (lower leg)
- trunk muscles
- triceps (backs of upper arms)
- shoulders

Loosening up means shaking off the tension that inhibits performance by altering movement and interrupting a harmonious mind-body connection. Posture and movement indicate the effects of daily tensions and pre-performance stress. A player’s dangling his limbs or rolling his head in a circular motion are observable efforts toward “getting loose”. A very common technique among the top players is voluntarily contracting the muscles in a specific area of the body then releasing after holding for a few seconds. The player then repeats the technique with other areas until the entire body feels more relaxed, more responsive, and free of tension.
Stretching

Racquetball is a very dynamic sport that requires tremendous plyometric (instant muscle firing) abilities. The bottom line is that if you do not stretch before making these plyometric demands, your body cannot respond properly. Aside from what we all know (and often wish to ignore) about the necessity of stretching to prevent injury, stretching before playing contributes an observable and measurable increase in any player’s abilities in rallying, shooting, getting, etc. Stretching of each body part should be done slowly and held for 20 - 30 seconds.

Breathing

Since there is a direct connection between breathing and anxiety, it is one of the most important indicators of the ability to perform. The quick shallow breathing that signifies tension can greatly inhibit performance as well as athletic endurance. Most all the top competitors reported paying special attention to relaxed, deep breathing prior to a match. Many reported counting their breaths, establishing a particular rhythm, or simply breathing deep and easy while concentrating on the words "easy" or "relax".

Mental Preparation

Recurring ideas for mental preparation included everything from positive self-programming to visual imagery. Two components seem necessary: 1) establishing confidence that empowers the best possible execution and a formidable presence on the court and 2) some form of mentally playing through an ideal match to “get in the groove” of the thought processes that occur in a well played match (see Imagine That, KILLSHOT #15 - 1994 Instructional Special). Much of this has to do with an idea that is often overlooked that peak performance is not only physical but a mental-physical connection.

Warm-up

The pros’ physical warm-up is vigorous to say the least. While they may start slowly to warm up gradually, at the pro level, players escalate to a serious pace that demands from them physically much as will the upcoming match. The idea is to get the blood pumping, get the sweat flowing, and to get the muscles warm. Most players prefer on-court warm-ups, but many rely on stationary bikes or stair climbers to really heat things up. On-court shuffle drills seem to be another favorite. Obviously, the intensity of your optimum warm-up varies directly with your own physical condition.

Rehearsal

Shadow boxing, martial arts kata, or going through a swing motion are all forms of rehearsal that enhance peak performance. Visualization plays a huge role in establishing good form, but actually repeating movement with perfect form at varying speeds is far more powerful. In fact, “going through the motions” cues the body, establishes a clear mental image and yields a significant improvement in performance.

Concentration

One of the key factors separating professional athletes from the rest of us is a heightened ability to focus on performance. Many players are gifted with amazing abilities, but are unable to block out distractions that inhibit the total concentration necessary to perform at 100%. Every player shared some form of ritual to begin this concentration prior to beginning a match. Many simply concentrated on the ball, or a “blank slate”. Others described mental cues that they use throughout the course of a match to regain focus. Marty Hogan was a prime example with his exclamation of “play ball!” to himself whenever his focus seemed to be drifting. Use of the command verbally during a match and mentally before hand enabled him a focus and awareness the likes of which we have rarely seen in the sport.

The other ideas prior to playing to establish peak performance included: checking equipment, getting adequate rest, avoiding “heavy” meals or long gaps between meals (see Eating & Athletic Performance pg. 12 this issue), maintaining adequate hydration prior to a match, avoiding watching or refereeing too many other matches prior to playing, and avoiding “talking too much racquetball” prior to playing.

Fran Davis

Former women’s tour professional and current US national amateur team assistant coach Fran Davis describes a fairly rigid and ritualized approach to pre-match warm-up:

I always get to the club about an hour and a half before a big match. I head straight for the locker room and avoid contact with others as much as possible. First I stretch to start preparing my body and signal my mind that it’s time to get down to business. Next I want to get my heart rate up and break a light sweat by stair climbing or stationary biking for fifteen to twenty minutes. I try to find the zone where I’m starting to warm up but not to wear out. Next I seek out an empty court to hit some shots. I begin to hit at about 50% velocity while paying attention to my body movement and footwork throughout my swing. I gradually increase to 60%, then 70% and so on up to about 90%. I know that if a tournament is going on, I will probably have to jump to a new court several times to hit as many shots as I want, since the same one will rarely be open that long. When I feel properly warm and loose, I will change to a fresh shirt and begin to concentrate on my mental preparation. I put on the headphones to help shut out the chaos around me and to signify to others not to approach me while I focus. It’s very important for me to stay alone at this point. I always use music that is upbeat, but have to be careful not to get too keyed up for a match. I usually do some more stretching so that I don’t get stiff while I work on focus. I want to do some mental rehearsal for rallies, to reach a point where I feel confident, and crisp, and my focus is solid.

Mister Roberts' Neighborhood

It's a beautiful day in the neighborhood for Andy Roberts as he closes the gap to number 1 Cliff Swain

By Mark Henry

Denver Coca-Cola Pro Am

Swain Picks up where he left off • Bronfled - Harripersad, Ellis - Boscia stir up some first round excitement • Ray stands firm with Monchik, then guts it out against Roberts • Katz pulls the upset in three over Doyle • Players come prepared this year for altitude as a factor • Mary Ann Alonzi and Co. at the Lakewood Athletic Club continue a fine tradition with this second year event

The thin air in the mile high city didn't seem to lower the performances of the players who made the trek to compete in the Coca-Cola Pro Am. Lots of upsets and near upsets kept action tense as Colorado fans witnessed a near defeat by Colorado State champ Tony Boscia against John Ellis. Ellis managed to hang tough, though, and by the time the dust had settled in the tie breaker he was on top. Michael Bronfeld, Amateur Nationals champion knocked out Roger Harrpersad in a five game battle and Dan Fowler was eliminated by Kelly Gelhaus.

Cliff Swain sailed through the tournament with his only problem being in the form of Ellis who took two games from Swain and forced him into a rare tie breaker.

Texans Drew Kachtik and Mike Guidry battled it out in the quarters. These guys are more familiar with each other's style than any others on the tour so it's always a treat to see them compete. The third amigo, Aaron Katz continuing with his super season, played well into the semis before being knocked out by a fired-up Mike Ray.

Dallas
VCI Challenge Cup Series

- Kachtik acts as spoiler • First round true to form, good matches from Harripersad - Robinson, and Greenfeld - O'Neil • Vogel smokes past González in the sixteens • Can't get much closer than Ellis - Monchik • Greenfeld surprises Doyle •

Roberts faces great matches with Ellis, then Guidry for his first win this season • After three quarters already this season, Katz sits this one out to team with VCI and the beautiful Landmark club as Tournament host •

It's always an exciting showdown when the pros storm the home turf of the Best of Texas. This year's VCI Challenge Cup Series event proved to be no exception as high noon bore down on the beautiful Landmark Club in Dallas.

Memphis

Hampton Inn PRO CLASSIC

Christmas 1995
Two of Texas’ best shooters fought it out in the semis in an intense five game struggle that pitted the speedy Mike Guidry against an always fearsome Drew Kachtik. When the smoke cleared, Guidry was the quick and Kachtik the dead.

To get to that showdown Kachtik had to survive a five game scramble with the Dominator Swain and a close four game battle against Woody Clouse. Guidry had to out maneuver the control-Meister Ray to win his spot in the semis.

The final pitted Roberts against Guidry in a five-game melee that see-sawed back and forth until Roberts could pull it out in the tie breaker. Roberts is playing like a man on fire at this point in the season and his injury this summer seems to be completely out of influence. He had to slip by Ellis to win his spot in the final in a match that saw him come back from a two-games-to-one deficit to advance.

Conspicuous by his absence in the tourney at least into the quarters was another Texan, Aaron Katz. His duties as tournament director at this VCI stop prevented him from taking part in the fracas.

Memphis
Hampton Inn Pro Classic

- Roberts’ first event victory in hometown since 1991 - Katz re-asserts himself as one of the best of Texas - Rankin seizes the upset from Gonzalez - Marinno beating the odds just to walk, grabs a game from Kachtik - Ray shocks crowd with Swain upset - Tempers flair between Doyle & Kachtik - Marty Austin, Quinn Roberts, Hampton Inns, and the crew from the incredible Racquet Club of Memphis outdo themselves in both excitement and hospitality.

After a long dry spell in his hometown, Roberts managed to shut down the jinx and take the Hampton Inn Pro Classic at the Racquet Club of Memphis. He pounded Ray in the final in three games after stopping slugger Tim Doyle.

Ray had already dispensed the almost unstoppable Swain in a five game match that was reminiscent of the Ray of a couple of seasons past. He then had to slide past Guidry to earn his berth in the final match and managed to do that without much ceremony.

Ruben Gonzalez, the game’s elder statesman has been struggling of late and was knocked out early by Brian Rankin who saw action at both collegiate racquetball powerhouses Memphis State and

John Ellis and Andy Roberts battle it out at the Landmark Club in Dallas.

Atlanta
VCI Challenge Cup Series

- Another Swain clean sweep - 32's to victory in the final without a single game loss • Kachtik denied vengeance from last year's nationals • Ellis can't answer the bell for the sixteens • Hamilton: no trouble from Vogel's bullets • Karp shows signs of greatness • Alan Tarem and Co. at the Atlanta Falcon's Sports Complex team with VCI for another great event and raise serious dollars for Georgia Council on Child Abuse •

Swain marches to the sea. After two tournament defeats in Memphis and Dallas, Swain regained his earlier tourney form. He routed the tour in Atlanta, going the entire weekend without dropping a game to the likes of Monchik, Ray, Katz, and Muller. Chalking up decisive victories in every match-up.

Opposite: Mike Ray seems to be getting back on track, playing through the semis in both Memphis and Denver.

With similar game styles Swain and Monchik always provide plenty of action and crowd-pleasing moves in every match-up.

Swain still holds a commanding lead on the number one ranking but Andy Roberts has closed the gap somewhat with three wins in the last five stops.

match he once again became the untouchable player that’s been dominating the tour.

Roberts, coming off two pivotal victories that tightened the gap between first and second spot in the rankings couldn’t get past Monchik in the quarters. The Atlanta VCI Challenge Cup Series event, held at the Falcon’s Sports Complex is always an industry spectacle. Held during the sporting goods Super Show the tournament is always attended by the game’s movers and shakers who are usually treated to a brand of fine-honed competition.

Monchik showed some endurance with a win over Kachtik in the 16’s then successfully getting rid of Roberts in the semis. He didn’t have enough, however to stop Swain.

The Shop n' Save Pro Am is always a tournament full of heavy competition and this year was no exception with several matches going into tie breakers.

With the sweet taste of victory from Memphis and Dallas still in his mouth, Roberts flew into the city of steel with a mission. Swain, still high from his recent Super Show win in Atlanta, was brought down to earth again by one of the Best of Texas. This time Guidry managed to hold off Swain in a four game duel that saw Guidry drop the first game then take charge and win the next three decisively.

Roberts had to play through Ray and Doyle to earn his spot in the final but perhaps his toughest match came early against a fired-up Derek Robinson. Never to be counted out, Robinson lost the first two games to Roberts then came back in a fireball taking the next two. Roberts proved to have the edge in stamina, though, and held Robinson to only one point in the tie breaker.

Kachtik and Monchik battled through a rough five-gamer that left Kachtik standing after the skirmish. It took its toll on him in the next match as he dropped three to Swain.

Doyle played tough but both Muller and Katz took him to tie breakers. Doyle showed what he was made of against Katz; down two games to none then coming back strong to take the next three.

Home boy Dan Obremski looking for an opportunity to shine played strong against Jason Manino but couldn't hold on to outlast Guidry. Guidry was on the roll that took him all the way into the final, but Roberts finished him in three for the win.

Most of the controversy over who is the greatest comes down to the criteria used to evaluate greatness. The first famous players in the game were players like Bud Muehlisen and Bill Schmidek. The next “generation” of players became the first “pros” such as Charlie Brumfield, Steve Serot, Steve Keeley, and Steve Strandedmo, although it probably was not until Marty Hogan came along that they had anything like celebrity status.

Hogan’s incumbency introduced more professionalism, more media attention, and more public interest, as well as an industry-wide obsession with power that would forever separate the old masters from the new breed. Mike Yellen was riding the crest of the wave when the oversize frames became the norm, an innovation that would again alter the abilities necessary to dominate the tour. With the sluggers coming into prominence, we began to see the emergence of today’s stars.

The Aaron Katz’ article on the following pages, while admittedly by the author shows some bias to those players in more recent memory and at the most evolved point of the game, does employ some sound insight in its evaluations. Still, there was clearly so much amazing talent in earlier days that we felt the need to hear from some insiders who saw some of this amazing piece of history first-hand. Is the greatest the best natural athlete, the biggest innovator, the most accomplished, the most recognized, or the most feared?

The first thing we came to in putting together this piece is that today, Cliff Swain has the goods. He has overwhelmingly earned the right to stand among the likes of Hogan, Yellen, and Brumfield. But I think it’s almost an insult to Cliff to write the book on him so soon, before he has ever become as good as we think he will eventually be. To watch Swain today is to see greatness as we have rarely seen it in our young sport.

“When you look at the greats over the short history of our sport, I think you have to recognize that we’re talking about three to four distinctly different games that I’m not sure can be realistically compared to one another. As a result, I think you can look at who dominated, and break it down to the Brumfield Era, the Hogan Era, the Yellen Era, and now the Swain Era.”

- Hank Marcus

“I can’t describe the level of intensity of the players in the Brumfield days. Winning meant winning at all costs. We would drill and train for literally ten to twelve hours a day, seven days a week. These guys would do ten mile runs almost every day. Maybe we didn’t have the body builder pros that we would later see in the ’80’s and ’90’s, but the players were in phenomenal shape. They could regularly go three hour matches. Most of today’s players would be standing around with their tongues hanging out after only a few of the marathon rallies we used to have. Those guys were so intense, I’ve seen Brumfield lose in a pro stop, but stay on the court afterward for hours and hours perfecting the shot that cost him the match.”

- Marty Hogan

“Brumfield would come to every tournament with all these new techniques that he had just invented and perfected, so he stayed ahead of everyone else and there was no way to prepare for what he might do.”

- Hank Marcus

"It's very difficult to compare the best players from each time period and select the greatest player of all time. I feel you have to look at the different players and the type of racquets used in each era to single out the great players.

Charlie Brumfield established the ultimate standard of how to play fundamentally correct in the 1970's. He employed smart serving, receiving, great shot selection, and sound center court and back court play. He mastered the physical and mental parts of the game and dominated all the players into the late 1970's. It should be noted that his game was control oriented.

Marty Hogan was the next dominating player on the tour. He was the first great player to combine both power and control. He was also the first truly athletically gifted athlete to play the game. He elevated the standard of power racquetball to the highest level. He was the star who put racquetball on the map, and set the standard for which all current power players aspire.

Mike Yellen was an equally great player to Brumfield and Hogan. Mike performed efficiently and powerfully on the court. His style was so smooth and effortless, but without the flair of Hogan and Brumfield. Unfortunately, because his game lacked the flair, his true greatness was overlooked by many racquetball observers. He was a near equal to Hogan and he went head to head with Marty over and over again. He was truly a great player.

The fourth player I would put in this category of greatness is Cliff Swain. He has dominated the tour with a power game, great serving, and a true competitor's mentality. The book is still open on cliff, but he is making great strides to becoming one of the few great players of all time."

- Steve Strandemo

"You cannot accurately compare the early pro days with today. It's so hard to size up such vastly different styles. Making bigger racquets changed the game forever. You have to give credit to Hogan who, at age 16, dominated the tour, changed the face of the pro game, and really is responsible for giving players any real professional status. But then there are so many other great players, guys like Ruben Gonzalez - what can you say about somebody who has done what he has done?"

- Charlie Drake

"I think Charlie Brumfield has made the greatest overall contribution to the sport as a player. I can't objectively pass judgement on myself along these lines, so I have to totally throw out anything that I have done or think I've done. Second to Brumfield's accomplishments, I think there is an outstanding group of players like Steve Strandemo, Bill Schmidke, Steve Serot, Steve Keeley, Mike Yellen, Bret Harrett, Cliff Swain, and Dave Peck that have to be right up there. Beyond that little group, I think there are tremendous players like Craig McCoy, Jerry Hillecher, Ruben Gonzalez, and lots more that have definitely showed some greatness."

- Marty Hogan

Cliff Swain, legend in progress
THE GREATEST

Aaron Katz

Who is the greatest? Is it Michael Jordan, Bill Russell, George Mikan or Oscar Robertson? Is it Joe DiMaggio, Willie Mays, Hank Aaron, or Barry Bonds - what about Ivan Lendl, Rod Laver, or Jimmy Connors? Many a beer has been sold over questions like these. Cutting across generational lines, new technology, and the changes in style that a sport naturally incurs over the decades, identifying the greatest turns out to be a thankless and time-consuming challenge. I intend to cut through all of the vagaries of this analysis and give you my opinion of the greatest (or ten greatest) of all time.

Having been an avid fan of professional racquetball since 1982, and a touring pro since 1988 I must admit I missed several of the prime years of some of the players I will be evaluating. However, I tried to compensate for this by doing some good old fashioned muckraking and researching.

The idea for this article originated in November, 1994 when IRT Commissioner Hank Marcus, IRT Satellite Tour director Eric Muller, and several touring pros joined me in a discussion of how today's pro players would match up with the pros of yesteryear. After a couple of hours of well versed arguing, I decided I needed to settle the dispute.

More than I imagined, it was a difficult task. If you were able to beam the top ten of all time to the present and play them off against each other, Cliff Swain and the top players of today's game would win in a landslide. However much of this has to do with the great increase in technology of racquets that has led to shot-making and power never before seen in the sport. So, it became necessary to bring in other criteria, including: national championships won, tournaments won, how the player fared with his rival in his prime, longevity, consistency, and finally, the impact the player had on the future of the sport. It became easy to defend the top four as the top four, and almost as easy to defend the following six as the next in line. Difficulties arose in defending the order of the top four, then in the order of the following six. All my research and debate has left me with the following roster and defenses. I will concede some bias toward more recent players, having far more often seen and competed against them.

1. Cliff Swain

The lanky southpaw from Braintree, Massachusetts has all but sewed up his fourth National Championship. Cliff Swain's career began in 1985 when, in Tulsa Oklahoma, he won the ninth tournament he'd ever played. To prove it was no fluke, he made a statement by winning Ektelon Nationals with victories over Marty Hogan, Mike Yellen, and Gregg Peck (then the #1, #2, and #3 on the tour). While Swain's rise to the top was slower than many thought it should have been, he finally captured the #1 ranking in 1989. At that point, he looked to secure a long term contract with a major racquetball manufacturer. When the deal Swain expected was not there, his observation of the woeful state of professional racquetball and a chance meeting with Boris Becker prompted him to take a run at professional tennis.

Although Swain accomplished little within tennis circles, it seems clear today that his two year hiatus set the groundwork for him to develop the mental toughness and discipline to dominate the men's professional tour. His return was not met with great success, several early round losses and some uninspired performances had many questioning whether Swain would return to his previous form. His fourteen victories in nineteen tournaments last season dispelled all doubts.

Several factors go into Swain's receiving the nod as the greatest player ever. To go with his four National Titles he has won more than 40 tournaments, second only to Hogan's 60+. Since his rookie year, Swain has always been in the top five. In addition, nobody ever dominated Swain. In his early years when concentration lapses resulted in several early round losses, his record against Hogan and Yellen was formidable. In fact, several blowouts of Hogan late in Marty's career seemed to break the indomitable spirit of racquetball's greatest legend.

Today, Swain absolutely dominates his nearest competitors. Try this for a statistic: in the last 1 1/2 years, Swain has lost five total matches to Andy Roberts, Tim Doyle, Mike Guidry, and Drew Kachtik, the #2-#5 players on the tour (0 to Roberts, 2 to Doyle, 2 to Kachtik, and 1 to Guidry). Although difficult to measure, I anticipate Swain's changing the style of professional racquetball. Already clones such as John Ellis and Sudsy Monchik have wreaked havoc with the Swain style of no-holds-barred, "smashmouth" racquetball.

2. Mike Yellen

This was the toughest and most controversial of my top picks. Mike Yellen never dominated the way Hogan and Swain did. He won approximately 25 tournaments in a career that spanned over 13 years. However, Yellen has several other factors in his favor, including being the only player to ever win five consecutive National titles. His analytical approach always left him ahead of the competition at season's end. And, although others won more tournaments throughout the season in a couple of Yellen's national championship years, he still ended up on top. Nobody will remember that the 1993 Bulls and 1992 Cowboys did not have the best record in the regular season, only that as did Yellen, they emerged as the best at season's end.

Another factor in Yellen's favor was that he defeated Hogan for all five national titles when Hogan was still in his prime at ages 24-28. The final accolade securing Yellen's position as #2 was the fact that in the twilight of his career when everyone had already counted him out, Yellen proved he could adapt to the new "second generation" power style of play by reaching the #1 ranking before retiring in 1992.

Yellen impacted the sport from a strategy and mental aspect as much as any other player, and although his control style is not utilized by many of the up and coming players, Yellen's use of the angles and game planning will be around forever.

3. Marty Hogan
The Cassius Clay and Babe Ruth of racquetball, Marty Hogan is unquestionably the most dynamic and exciting personality ever to play the game. Hogan's athletic ability was second to none, and his marketing flair and braggadocios style still make him the most recognizable player in the sport.

Hogan's record for longevity is second to none. From 1976-1991 he was a top 3 player and legitimate contender for the national title. Even today, nobody has ever dominated as Hogan did in the late 1970's. However, after Dave Peck defeated Hogan for the national title in 1982, he would never again finish the season as #1 (excluding 1989 when the season was cancelled and only four events were played. Hogan out-pointed everyone else without advancing to a final, going to the semi's four times). That leaves Hogan with four National Titles and 60+ victories, a remarkable record by any standard, but his inability to defeat Yellen from 1983-87 caused him to lose the nod for #2. Whether he lacked motivation because of his tremendous financial success, or simply burned out, Hogan was unable to unseat Yellen.

Regardless, Hogan's impact on the sport is second to none. He revolutionized the power game and set the stage for generations to come to approach the game as a professional athlete. His ability to control a crowd like a conductor will always be remembered by anyone fortunate enough to have seen him play.

4. Charlie Brumfield
I must confess, I never had an opportunity to see Charlie Brumfield play in person, as he had all but retired by the time I started. However I have heard of his legends and lore. Brumfield dominated the professional game for several seasons when the tour consisted of mostly converted paddle ball players. Brumfield should be remembered as a great champion and certainly an innovator when the sport was young, but where to put him on this list is more of a guess on my part.

Brumfield's impact on the pro game lies most in his being the first to study the way the game was played and seek out the percentages. He represented the last generation of players that picked up racquetball as adults. Due to the changes in equipment and training techniques, the style of play has totally changed. An interesting test of his abilities would have been to have seen if he could have adapted to the tremendous changes that swept the sport in the years following his domination.

5. Dave Peck
Dave Peck's career was volatile, exciting, unique, and probably the greatest roller coaster ride ever. From 1978 to 1983 he had an unexpected rise to the top. An ex-football player from El Paso, who didn't pick up a racquet until the age of 19, Peck took the tour by storm. After being named "Rookie of the Year", Peck began his ascent, which culminated as the 1982 national champion. While competing to defend his title in 1983, a freak injury against Yellen in the Nationals resulted in a compartment syndrome which would prevent Dave from ever returning to his former level. Several tough seasons following the injury were marked by regrettable temper tantrums and fewer wins. Several lean years following his injury, and an inability to adapt to the power of players like Swain and Inoue dropped Peck a couple of notches below his nearest competitors.

Peck's impact on the sport is unquestioned. His power/control style revolutionized the stroke mechanics that are used by Swain and several of the other top pros. He was the one who established the backhand grip rotation that is widely accepted among instructors and players of all skill levels. In addition, Peck's personality and tie-ins with Life Cycle, Nautilus, and Cybervision added much needed credibility to a fledgling professional sport.

6. Ruben Gonzalez
Ruben Gonzalez is still amazing spectators today with his unique skills and desire at the age of 43. Although he spent the majority of his career mired in the #5-#8 range, playing second fiddle to the likes of Hogan, Yellen, Peck, and Harnett, Gonzalez is a testament to courage and desire. He reached the pinnacle of the sport in 1988 by winning the national championship at the age of 36. Gonzalez gains points for longevity as he has never dropped out of the top eight since he burst on the scene as an unknown amateur to advance to the finals of the 1980 Ektelon Nationals before losing to Yellen.

Although his record against his rivals pales in comparison to others on this list, Gonzalez has been an inspiration to young and old alike and his impact on the sport will last for generations to come.

7. Andy Roberts
Few players have had such a distinguished career as Andy Roberts'. He methodically moved his way up the ranks with what was arguably the most successful amateur career ever. After turning pro in 1989, he applied the same discipline and drive that catapulted him to the top of the amateur game. Roberts has finished #2 or #3 on the tour for five consecutive years and has never dropped out of the top 4. Having recovered from an off season knee surgery, Roberts is well on his way to another stellar season.

Although he has been dominated by Swain for the past few seasons, he has certainly controlled his rivalries with Doyle, Kachtik, Ray, and the rest of the IRT. A rare accomplishment, Roberts was able to dominate Hogan and Yellen during much of their last couple of seasons.

If he is unable to surpass Swain over the next couple of years he might be considered the Ernie Banks of Racquetball, the greatest player never to win "the big one". Roberts' impact on the sport is difficult to measure, his low key personality combined with his unusually large frame for a racquetball player has caused him to adopt a style with which few of today's younger players seem comfortable. However, this should not take away from Andy's 15+ tournament victories and a commitment to becoming possibly the best round player in professional racquetball today.

8. Mike Ray
One of the last remnants of the control style game, Mike Ray's stay in the top 8 has definitely crossed over generations. His career is highlighted by his National Championship year in 1991. However, Ray's ranking has varied, dropping as low as #13 in 1987 and often ranging between the #5-#8 spot. Mike has proved to be a remarkably resilient player over the years, learning to adjust to different styles and always managing to find himself among the elite of the sport.

One of the most likeable players in the history of the game, his demeanor both on and off the court has made Mike one of the true assets of the pro tour. Although his style of play has all but gone the way of the T-Rex, Ray's imprint on the game is indelibly stamped via his guidance as an executive IRT board member throughout the recent boom years of the tour. Ray has come to the head of the pack as a leader and executive, bringing the vision and dedication to business that he brings to the court.
9. Bret Harnett

Bret Harnett definitely had one of the most storied careers in the history of the game. An enigma to his peers, he arguably dominated the game in the late 80's but failed to ever win a national title. Two consecutive years he missed finishing #1 by one match, thwarted once by Yellen in Burnsville, Minnesota, and then, the following year, by Hogan in Seattle. Harnett won more tournaments over that period than anyone else but failed to win the big ones.

A series of ill fated comebacks and frustrating losses over the last several seasons has tarnished an otherwise great career. Harnett will always be remembered as one of the greatest pure athletes to ever play the sport as well as the consummate gentleman on the court. His go-for-broke style of play (although at times his Achilles heel) has made him one of the most spectacular players to watch.

Harnett's impact on the sport would seem to be minimal as his phenomenal athletic ability afforded him the opportunity to play a style that few would be able to emulate.

10. Drew Kachtik

Drew Kachtik rounds out the list of top ten. Kachtik has had a perplexing career. He burst on the scene winning two events and getting as high as #2 before a season-ending injury caused him to miss nationals and finish #5 in his rookie year. Kachtik, not armed with the weapons that several other of the top players had, rode his steely determination and gritty style of play to finish #1 in only his second year on the tour. Swan's return to the pro game combined with Kachtik's stagnation has prevented him from challenging for a national championship the last couple of seasons. Still, Kachtik is one of the most consistent players in the game, losing only twice in the last two years before the quarterfinals.

Kachtik has been on the short end of the stick in his rivalries with Swain, Roberts, and Doyle, which does not bode well for his place in racquetball history. However, he seems to have carved out a niche for himself with his "lunch pail" never-say-die approach to the game.

Players on the bubble are Gregg Peck, Tim Doyle, Ed Andrews and Jerry Hilechek. An additional factor that was not brought into consideration was the fact that several of the players who played during the Catalina Tour in the early eighties were essentially protected from much of the great young talent, they participated in a era that was closed to the top 12 players and only 4 regional qualifiers. How far this set back the men's pro game is difficult to measure but kudos go to Hank Marcus for revitalizing a tour that was on the verge of extinction after the politics of the mid to late 1980's.
ESPN & IRT Agree to Four Event Package

The International Racquetball Tour has announced an agreement with ESPN & ESPN II to televise four events featuring the best racquetball players in the world.

The one-hour shows will be produced by JM Productions and the IRT who have teamed up to produce the two previous ESPN telecasts in 1993 and 1994. The events will be taped in May for airing this fall at the beginning of the racquetball season. The shows will be seen on ESPN and ESPN II and will run once a week over a month period to create continuity and growing interest. This agreement will produce the most credible and broadly seen exposure for racquetball in the history of the sport.

Introduces The Official Phone Card of the International Racquetball Tour

TargetTel Inc. has just announced the newest addition to their line of collectible phone cards -- The Official Phone Card of the International Racquetball Tour. Proceeds from this card will go towards Fibromyalgia Research and the Tour.

This card, available April 1, allows the IRT card collector to receive 30 minutes of phone time for $10 that can be used anywhere in the continental US. The card is automatically renewable and rechargeable at the rate of 33 cents per minute.

The Official Phone Card of the International Racquetball Tour will be a sought after item. The IRT Phonecard can be used from any touch-tone phone in the continental US, public or private, without the use of coins or other cards. This is the first of a limited edition of only 2,000 cards, its value is expected to increase substantially in the years to come.

VCI/IRT
Raise $6,000 for the Georgia Council on Child Abuse

Through the continuing efforts of Atlanta tournament director Alan Turem in conjunction with VCI over $6,000 was raised at the 1995 VCI-ProAm for the Georgia Council on Child Abuse. Turem and VCI Region Manager Frank Petru presented the donation at a banquet held at the event. In addition the IRT donated an additional $500 to help a great cause.

IRT Goes Online

The information superhighway just got a new vehicle speeding down its winding course. The IRT has recently signed an agreement to place tournament results, player profiles, pro tips, and product updates on the Internet.
In the 1970's we couldn't build racquetball courts fast enough. In the days of Jimmy Carter, "The Love Boat," and disco, we all played racquetball. We played so much racquetball, in fact, that we would pay by the hour to play, and consider ourselves extremely lucky if we didn't get "bumped" off the court at the end of that hour. But racquetball did not sustain the changes brought on by 1980's. Clubs branched out to embrace new trends such as weight machines, aerobics classes, and stair climbers. In most markets during the 1980's, racquetball, the sport that launched the club industry, began losing serious ground in the ongoing battle for profitable use of floor space. Those beautiful courts could easily hold more stationary bikes and tanning beds than you could shake a CBK at.

Having significant status as the only game in town, few foresaw the approaching need to maintain profitability in the growing fitness market. As a result, shortsightedness nearly killed the sport. Organizations came and went, leaving enough initials flying around to make your head spin. The pro tour closed its doors to new players and went on the road in what was perceived by many as a display of elitist snobbery. Television production standards of the time left the impression that the racquetball's fast pace made it unsuitable for TV. Publications vanished without notice. Racquet prices went right through the roof. In short, a thriving industry coped an attitude and totally forgot about the need for customer service and long term thinking. We became a discontented lot and local tournaments became the stages for our temper tantrums.

But the industry was only partly to blame. Egos and resentments at the club level ran unchecked. A nation of C players adopted a routine method of conduct toward opponents and referees that would make John McEnroe blush. We made court reservations and never showed. In a massive quest to get something for nothing, we bypassed established retailers that did deliver good customer service in favor of renegade entrepreneurs that would sell equipment out of their bags at embarrassing prices. We returned broken frames as "defective" after cracking them over courtside benches. Our discontent became such a chip on our shoulder that we rationalized the idea that the sport and every manufacturer owed us something and we as players acted as irresponsibly as the industry we blamed.

All of these combined to produce a mass exodus from the game. The numbers dropped, the bottom line on racquetball sagged, and clubs took away our courts. Then, as the picture began looking really bleak, something happened. Realizing the benefits of the sport itself, and that its unique appeal made racquetball a terrific product, a handful of visionaries saw the need to reverse the negatives, instigate some long-term thinking, and utilize the media and the industry to re-establish the profitability that would bring the programming back to the clubs, and the players back to the courts.

Today, we're fighting back for racquetball. What's more, we're not just fighting, we're cooperating. In fact, the industry is rallying together. Competing entities are looking past market share to build a bigger market to share. The biggest indicator of the new spirit of cooperation was the recent "Racquetball Summit" held at the Sporting Goods Manufacturers Association Supershow in Atlanta. Annual meeting ground for many leading industry manufacturers and the Racquet Sports Committee, this year's show saw everyone with a stake in the future of the game gather in one small room for the first time in history. The roster read like a who's who of racquetball, professional and amateur, new school and old, ranging from the enthusiastic to the skeptical, but all committed to a goal of building the game that is well within sight. For the first time, in fact, the goal is so much within sight that everyone in the room has ventured major dollars toward its realization. Picture, if you will, unlikely allies in direct competition with one another engaged in a very calm and courteous discussion of the big picture. Directors of the IRT, the AARA, the newly formed USPRO teaching organization, and The Racquet Sports Committee, top brass from each company involved in industry manufacturing, media, retailers, and many others notorious for cutthroat competition sustained the entire afternoon without the slightest bloodshed. It could only happen in 1995.

What the discussion yielded was the need to work through clubs to build participation. With a commitment for assistance from John McCarthy of the IHRSA association of clubs, the task ahead would be to utilize different avenues all aimed at filling our nation's courts with players. While this may sound obvious, it is the first time that this has been collectively espoused as the primary agenda by a group that has the jumped directly into the successful racquetball program, providing club market. This support should take the form of assistance for clubs in building successful racquetball programming, providing forum for communication in both directions, and extending visibility for the sport.

In terms of visibility, the pro tour is off and running. According to International Racquetball Tour commissioner Hank Marcus, “With the tour’s alliances with KILLSHOT Magazine in 1991 and with ESPN in 1993, we’ve brought racquetball back to the general public for the first time since the early 1980’s. Would-be players’ ability turn on racquetball on television and pick up racquetball on the newsstands will branch out even farther in a few weeks with pro tour information and instruction available on the Internet. While the new task force is the next necessary step and I have extended the support of the pro tour, the IRT and its allies V.W. Credit, Head Athletic, Spalding, and Wilson and would be open to any other industry manufacturers for the purpose of building support for the club market. This support should take the form of assistance for clubs in building successful racquetball programming, providing forum for communication in both directions, and extending visibility for the sport.

Zen and the Art of Shot Selection

Woody Clouse

A great deal of material is available today regarding shot selection. We could easily invest hours debating the merits of setting-up vs. cutting-off in a given scenario. The outcome would certainly reinforce the idea that variables such as your opponent's position, his ability, and his coverage tendencies should all influence your choices. Last year, Jack Newman reminded us that where we take the ball out of the air (its height at impact) should further limit our intelligent options (America's Most Wanted Instructional, KILLSHOT #12, Winter 1994).

While all these specifics are very important, I often think back to one of my earliest coaches who liked to cut through to the simplest components of any endeavor. All of his shot selection wisdom could be summed up in two simple "Zen-like" rules:

A) Hit a pass when your opponent is in front of you (he considered ceiling balls passes, as many of the early players did at the transformation from paddleball to racquetball)

B) Hit a pinch when your opponent is behind you.

And all of his intentions with these rules came from two simple ideas:

A) Kill shots present themselves often enough, no need to risk skips and plums by constantly shooting for the low boards

B) The goal is to control center court, if you do, you will win

Now I admit that when there is time to analyze and practice, the intricacies make things much more complicated. But in the heat of a rally, it's pretty hard to beat that simplistic approach. I have to admit that I have never beaten myself using his simple techniques.

Dominating center court should always be your first priority with your shot selection. If you forget this and force badly-timed kills, you will often beat yourself and give your opponents plenty of skips and left-up balls. With this in mind, you will noticeably reduce the pressure on your own back, while turning up the heat on your opponent. In controlling the center, you have a much greater margin for error, while your opponent must hit out of position, hit on the run, or find himself unable to return the shot. Ideally, your opponent must constantly play catch-up during a rally, or dig balls from the corners, both of which are the result of well timed passes.

If you find yourself in front, consider the pinch. Never ever hit the pinch without complete confidence that it will end the rally. There are only three possible results from an offensive shot attempt:

1) the shot will be left up
2) the shot will skip
3) the shot will end the rally

A skip is your worst enemy, but a left-up ball is far worse on a pinch than on a pass. A left-up pass will still allow you center court control, while a left-up pinch forces you out (and your opponent into) center court.

All those years ago, I wondered why we never worked on rollouts. Now with sixteen years more experience, I understand. In a game where so much has changed, much has stayed the same. When you have tried everything that is high tech and radical, maybe it's time to inject a little "old school" into your game.

In the 15 years since the formation of the WPRA Tour, Lynn Adams and Michelle (Gilman) Gould have split eleven national championships. In fact, only two other players, Heather McKay with three and Caryn McKinney with one have ever won a WPRA national title. While female players such as Peggy Steading and Shannon Wright showed greatness in the earlier "pre-professional" days, these four represent a very elite club indeed. As with the men's pros, the argument could be made regarding the best ever in favor of either of the two most dominant players depending on the criteria used to analyze. In the end, Adams faced a seemingly endless string of adversities to dominate right through the games major changes, while the jury is still out on an invincible Michelle Gould who from all indications may dominate the game for the rest of life as we know it.

I've gotten better at making gets off the back wall, is there anything I can do now to make more offensive shots out of these gets?

When you are making gets off the back wall, it's easy to try to take the shot from in front of the ball and simply reaching behind it. Instead, practice positioning your body behind the ball more alike you would on a good set up so that you are moving your weight forward as you hit the ball. From this, you should gain both control and power. You will be allowing your body to assist with the work instead of “muscling” it with your arm. The position may be tricky to reach at first, but when you get used to is, it will feel much more natural.

As I get better at controlling center court, I'm finding myself in front of my opponent more often, and in good position for the pinch. I know that it's a good choice, but I am having trouble adjusting my swing to hit it effectively. What should I do?

Use the same swing motion that you would for other shots, just try to contact the ball deeper in your hitting zone. When you have found a natural and effective swing, you don't want to change it any more than you have to. Besides, a special swing for the pinch would telegraph your shot choice every time. By taking the ball deeper in your zone, your swing will easily create the necessary force and direction for the proper pinch. Remember the correct pinch hits low, side wall then front wall.

Mike Guidry, IRT #4

How can I improve my anticipation in so that I can start covering ground before my opponent begins his swing?

You can't. You may have some good guesses based on his habits and his stance, but that's all they are - guesses. Don't confuse guessing with anticipation. You are almost always much better off working for good center court position right up until your opponent actually swings. Only from his movement during his actual swing can you realistically begin to anticipate the resulting path of the ball.

First work on the tools necessary for effectively holding center court like efficient jockeying for position, proper clearing for his shots, and accurate shooting. You can almost never go wrong working for the center. Next try some speed drills to make better gets and set ups once you do learn where he is going with the ball. Then ask me what you can learn from his swing about where he is hitting.

Aaron Katz, IRT #8

What can I do when I'm playing someone with powerful service returns? My drive serves don't seem to shake him. My lob serves help, but when he cuts them off, he just Tee's off on them. Any suggestions?

Your drives are probably just what he wants. With your lobs, if he has plenty of time to set up, it may be even better for him. You want to turn that set-up time into mess-up time by increasing his anxiety and frustration.

Lobs timed in such a way to throw off his usual timing will help. That is, keep mixing up the pace of the lobs and the height of their arc. Keep the ball right on the side wall to make it even tougher. Go to his backhand for an added edge. Go deep to make him have to work harder for the good shot and keep you in center court.

Finally, one of the best ways to keep him back and off his timing is to just nick the side wall with your lob serve. Properly executed, the ball just sort of brushes against or "nicks" the side wall as it travels back on its path to the first bounce. With the ball hanging close to the wall and gently contacting it, you have greatly reduced his chances of effectively cutting it off. This alone will be frustrating for someone trying to rush in and blast.

You want your ball to nick the side wall higher the farther forward it hits, then progressively lower for deeper in the court. Ideally, always go for the low deep ones for best effect and maximum frustration for the big shooters.

Your serve kicking too far off the side wall, or coming way out off the back wall will nullify any effects you may have intended. Otherwise, this one just in the "nick" of time should back off the most aggressive receiver and prevent his heroic cut off attempts.

Your Show of Shows

If you play racquetball, by now you have probably heard of the Supershows. What is it? Where did it come from? What does it all mean? The Supershows is held in Atlanta each year in early February and is the largest trade show for sporting goods of all kinds in the world. The event began in 1986 with 700 exhibitors, 55,000 attendees, and 200 members of the press. The 1995 show featured more than 2,800 exhibitors, more than 110,000 attendees, and 900 members of the press. Owned and operated by the Sporting Goods Manufacturers Association, the Supershows has become the gathering grounds for the racquetball industry for commerce and politics. For the player, it marks the unveiling of new ideas and new goodies. This year’s show presented and exceptionally rich collection of attitudes and technology.

HEAD-liners

The top IRT pros including #1 Cliff Swain were a huge hit at the Sporting Goods Super Show in Atlanta bringing racquetball more exposure than it has ever received.

Thirty of the pros made an appearance at the HEAD Athletic booth followed by an autograph session. HEAD Athletic is the official Sportswear and Footwear of the IRT.

An Assault for Every Game Style!

Spalding has outdone themselves with the expansion of the successful Assault line into four unique frames comprising the new Assault series. The Official Racquet of the International Racquetball Tour now appears with dazzling graphics and among the four present a selection of features designed to suit a very diverse array of players. Early reports are a big thumbs up from the tour and most everyone else lucky enough to get their hands on early models. Spalding’s Jeff Miller explained, “Spalding’s prominence as the official racquet of the IRT has become a tremendous success for both the company and the tour. The new series just presents something better for every type of player.”

Green with Envy

Penn Racquet Sports continues to tighten its bonds with the IRT with invitations for the pros to spend some time at Penn’s Phoenix based headquarters in April. Penn also unveiled a huge inflatable Pro Penn Ball Can at the Shop N Save Pro Am in Pittsburgh. It seems the green balls are fast becoming everybody’s ball of choice.

Soak it Up

Forten string company of Poway California has added some great stuff to its exceptional list of strings and accessories including some new grip designs featuring a raised ridge for better grip traction. Forten’s Bill Bishop also presented one of the best new goodies unveiled at the Supershows in a reasonably-priced super absorbent device called the Sportsorb. Immediately dubbed by racquetball players as the “dive towel”, it can absorb more perspiration from players’ bodies and the court floor than a sponge the size of a Volkswagen (or thereabouts). What’s more, the thing slips conveniently in shorts’ pockets and when chilled slightly prior to playing provides a welcomed cooling towel.

Numbers Crunch

With all eyes still on Ektelon after the big move to Princeton, New Jersey, the company with the biggest share of the racquetball pie has leaped into whole-heartedly into the movement to promote the sport on all levels. Stressing communication among all groups with a vested interest in the sport, Ektelon initiated a survey of players, sales reps, and dealers to learn more about the state of the game. Among the findings were the recommendation by 61% of respondents to institute school programs to build interest among young people, and responses regarding players’ losing interest in the game as 35%-other sports interests, 23%-lack of time, and 20%-lack of partners. Ektelon Director of marketing Rob Ahrensdorf expressed particular emphasis on the finding that the number one appealing aspect of racquetball is its health benefit.

Grass Roots

Amidst an array of high tech paraphernalia and lab coats at the Supershows, the San Diego based Pro Kennex presented its new Kinetic Technology along with plans to venture farther into grass-roots programming.

New Kid on the Block

Gemini Racquetball has announced its debut in the high end racquet arena. Ron Halloran, president of the Richmond, Virginia based company described Gemini as a special racquet for the accomplished player, customized individually to that player’s standards. At a quick first look, the frame made a good impression.

Take a Bite Out of Racquetball

Ashaway Tine and Twine has announced the introduction of an new high-powered multifiber racquetball string called Powerkill Pro. The Rhode Island based Ashaway promises great durability and exceptional “bite”.
